Mitford's journey took her from Calcutta to Delhi, and she visited many of the major cities and towns along the way. She describes the bustling streets of Calcutta, the ancient ruins of Delhi, and the beautiful countryside of the Punjab. Mitford also met a wide range of people, from wealthy landowners to poor peasants, and she gives a vivid account of their lives and customs.

Mad Dogs and an Englishwoman is a valuable historical document, as it provides a first-hand account of India during a period of great change.

Mitford's writing is also full of humor and insight, and her book is a delightful read for anyone interested in India or travel literature.

About the Author

Mary Russell Mitford was born in 1787 in Hampshire, England. She was a poet, novelist, and playwright, but she is best known for her travel writing.

Mitford's other works include Our Village, a series of sketches of rural life, and Atherton, a novel about the English countryside.

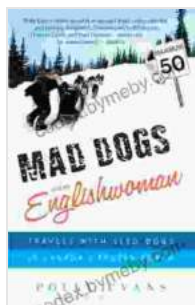

Mitford died in 1855, and she is buried in the village of Three Mile Cross, Hampshire. A plaque on her grave reads: "She loved the country and its people, and her writings have brought delight to generations of readers."
